Don't Tell Him It Can't Be Done.

"IT'S LIKE A BUNCH OF VERY OLD MEN GOT TOGETHER ON A golf course somewhere in 1954 and invented a set of rules as to how an attorney should represent people injured in catastrophic, and not so catastrophic, personal injury cases. The world has changed over and over again, but for some reason we keep those archaic and unfounded principles for the practice of law year after year," says Chad Hemmat. "The only rule that I and my partners, Jordan Levine and Julie Anderson, embraced when we started this firm was that every client will get 100 percent of our talent, energy and imagination in everything we do for them. Beyond that, we discarded the rule book."

For Chad Hemmat, being named to 2011 Super Lawyers® is only the latest recognition bestowed on him by colleagues that validates his "take no prisoners" litigation style. "He's stubborn and tenacious in the courtroom but has a humor and method of delivering his message without being overbearing," says his eleven-year partner, Jordan Levine. "If he feels it will get a better result for his client, don't tell him it can't be done."

Anderson Hemmat & Levine has built its reputation on being an aggressive, cutting-edge law firm exclusively representing the rights of injured people, thereby taking on the insurance giants everyday. "This isn't a part-time job for us," partner Julie Anderson says. "We battle the same handful of defense lawyers hundreds of times a year."

Anderson, Hemmat & Levine shattered the stereotype that a well-publicized firm would become so burdened with volume that it would invariably compromise on the individual attention a client gets. "We talk to hundreds of potential new clients a week but remain committed in our hard core pursuit of precision and excellence for our clients," says senior associate Ethan McQuinn.

Adds associate Andrew Phillips, "Just ask the last 25 attorneys Chad Hemmat tried cases against if they felt the volume of his practice negatively affected the way he aggressively pursued the insurance company for the injuries caused to our client."

Backed by Hemmat's commitment to excellence, Anderson, Hemmat & Levine continues to redefine the traditional rules of how injury cases are litigated.
